WHAT WE DID FOR BRAZIL.

The New York Sun aptly calls attention to the services rendered by the United States to the republic of Brazil during the recent rebellion. The sympathies of European nations were undoubtedly with the insurgents from the first. In the beginning it was only because, on general principles, anything that tends toward the downfall of a republic is agreeable to a monarchist or imperialist. But after Da Gama declared his desire to see the Brazilian empire restored this negative sympathy prepared to take active shape. If certain German and English naval officers at Rio Janeiro had had their way, the insurgents would have blockaded the port, cutting off from Petrópolis its customs revenues and supplies.

At once the United States government gave notice to Mello that no interference with American merchant ships in Rio harbor would be permitted. Then the British government followed in our wake and notified Mello and Da Gama to the same effect. The Sun says:

That the status of belligerency was never recognized by the United States, the rebellion was due to the fact that the United States did not desire recognition and the desired recognition, but taxed all the resources of its diplomacy to prevent any such proceeding on the part of other foreign governments. The United States' attitude towards Brazil is perfectly aware that during the last six months, when his own fate and that of republican institutions in Brazil were at stake, he had no right to claim the protection of either the United States or the United States availed a concerted concession of the rights of belligerents to the rebels, which would probably have availed them.

It is not likely that either he or any of those Brazilians who are sincere republicans will ever undertake the magnitude of their rebellion again.

The service which we rendered in their hour of need will be remembered in the case of republican institutions in Brazil, ought to have a profound and permanent effect on the future commercial and political relations of that country with the United States.

THAT SILVER CHURN.

That silver churn story concerning the youngest daughter of the Prince of Wales, Princess Maud, whom Lord Rosebery is to marry, is truly touching if it only touches the right spot. It seems that the Princess of Wales has at one of her country places a dairy fitted up, where she and her daughters play at butter making. The fact that Alexandra comes from Denmark, the leading dairy country of Europe, may perhaps account for her fondness for buttermilk and churning.

At any rate, in this royal dairy there is a silver churn, which the princesses play with their own hands to make the butter come. The milk and cream are kept in silver jars, porcelain lined, and the dairy itself is lined and floored with peacock blue tiling. After the Princess of Wales and her daughters have brought a little pat of butter in the silver churn, they retire to an elegant tea room adjoining, fitted with every luxury, spread the butter they have made upon some bread and have a feast, while somebody else cleans up the dairy things.

This proceeding is supposed to indicate to the British public the tremendously domestic tastes and indolent habits of Mrs. Wales and her daughters, if it was a plain, decent dairy, such as the girls of Great Britain earn their living in, and if these royal ladies did any real work there, certainly it would be commendable in them thus to show their interest in a useful occupation. But the little hunting they practice is only intended to throw a little dust in the eyes of the British public as to the sweetness of royalty, which it apparently does do.

A grand farce it is. We somehow remember in reading of it that Mrs. Maria Antoinette and her court ladies played at being dairy maids on the eve of the outbreak of the French revolution.

The courses of lectures to teachers and pupils given in the public schools are not always so useful and so in touch with practical things as they are in Philadelphia, where a course of laboratory lectures has this winter been given to teachers and school principals. One of the topics recently was on buds and branches. Many specimens of both were laid before the audience and dissected, and their differing parts traced out with a master hand. The teachers probably learned more of botany in an hour than some of them had found out in all the years of their life before. It was a pity that all the school children in the city could not have heard the lecture. Whatever tends to make human beings become interested in nature and to love the country makes them happier and better as well as healthier in their minds.

One of the most notable and picturesque gatherings of the year 1894 will be the reunion of the blue and the gray on the battlefield of Shiloh April 6 and 7. It is 22 years since that great fight occurred. The Shiloh Battleground Association has the best wishes of all Americans in its effort to preserve the memorable spot as a national park. Hundreds of unknown dead, both Union and Confederate, are buried there.

If Canada were part of the United States, the justice who forfeited his bail rather than face the consequences of aiding to corrupt the ballot would not now be cooling his heels comfortably in the Dominion.

If you want a story spread thoroughly and quickly, tell it to your best friend and charge him solemnly not to repeat it.

Colonel Breckinridge has an eloquent lecture on the subject of "Social Party."
